Leduc, E., & Tojerow, I. (2024). Home Work: Exploring the Labor Market Effects of Subsidizing Domestic Services. Labour Economics, 2024, vol. 90.

Abstract: This paper analyzes subsidies for the domestic services sector, an increasingly popular policy to create employment opportunities for low-skilled workers. Using Belgian administrative data, a differences-in-differences approach, and a shift-share instrumental variable, we estimate the local effects of the policy in targeted industries as well as overall effects on the labor market. We find that domestic service subsidies can increase female employment in the subsidized industries as well as the overall employment rate. This increase in employment is primarily driven by an increase in (formal) labor market participation and, to a lesser extent, a reduction in the rate of participation in unemployment insurance and in other social welfare programs. We also find that these subsidies can lead to an increase in the rate of work incapacity, likely due to the fact they broaden the population that can access the social safety net.

Abstract: We study the effect of job search monitoring (JSM) on individual labor market outcomes of the long-term unemployed. Exploiting the implementation of a JSM program targeted at jobseekers under the age of 49, we set up a regression discontinuity design that credibly identifies the program's causal effect on unemployment, employment, and disability insurance (DI) participation and participation in other social welfare programs within a three-year period. We find that JSM increases exits from unemployment to DI without affecting transitions into employment or other social welfare programs. We further find that the effect of JSM on DI materializes before any sanction can be imposed and monitored individuals are still 10 percentage points more likely to be on DI three years after the start of monitoring. Ultimately, exploring fiscal implications reveals that the decrease in unemployment transfers as a result of JSM is entirely offset by the increase in DI transfers.

Leduc, E., & Tojerow, I. (2025). Closing the Mismatch: Encouraging Jobseekers to Reskill for Shortage Occupations. IZA Discussion Paper No. 17731.

Abstract: We partner with a Public Employment Service to explore whether more jobseekers can be encouraged to reskill for occupations that are in shortage. We implement a large-scale field experiment in which 100,000 recently unemployed jobseekers receive information about shortage occupations and training opportunities. Treated jobseekers become more likely to search for a job in a shortage occupation and to enrol in trainings. However, the increase in training enrolment is driven by transversal trainings rather than occupational trainings. Ultimately, these changes in training participation and job search behaviour do not allow to foster entry into employment. Our findings suggest that there is room to steer unemployed jobseekers toward shortage occupations, potentially through trainings, but it remains unclear how to do so effectively.
